

October 2012

To Whom It May Concern,

It was my pleasure and privilege to have had Daniel Chcouri as a member of my team at Razoss Ltd. Razoss is a browser technology company which has developed a platform for distribution of content over any browser window in the Windows OS.

Daniel joined Razoss in the summer of 2010 as a developer on our server side team. He learned the company's product and strategy quickly and soon became a key member of our design team.

Daniel is a true autodidact. He learns very rapidly, is extremely diligent, and thoroughly reliable. While dealing with complex features and a demanding architecture, Daniel always kept his work simple and with a low threshold, allowing for new developers to easily enter his code. His coding was highly modular, elements were developed as plugins, leaving the core of the system thin and coherent.

Daniel easily thinks outside of the box. He would be able to put together demos and other short-term required solutions on a very short notice thanks to his creative thought and skill. His willingness to take on such difficult and demanding tasks was key in my ability to push forward on funding, marketing and sales efforts.

Daniel sees the bigger picture. Over the course of our product's development, we were faced with many barriers and restrictions which would have impacted our product's design and features, had it not been for Daniel's ingenuity and understanding of the system as a whole. For example, when faced with a hard restriction on security, by the Google App Engine environment we were working on, Daniel developed an independent authentication system which corresponded with our GAE and enabled us to implement our user system securely and as planned.

Daniel initiates. Working with Daniel, I had the full confidence that the best possible methods for development were always being practiced. Furthermore, every so often, Daniel would raise an initiative to automate, improve and/or maximize a process or feature in the system. This left management quiet and confident regarding our entire backend system, which was in Daniel's domain.

Daniel developed very good people skills during his tenure at Razoss and I am proud to say that he has become a real team-player. He is able to take into account the personal and professional needs of his superiors as well as of his team-mates and is always a pleasure to work with.

I look forward towards working with Daniel again in the future and congratulate his next employer and team-members in the meantime.

Sincerely,

Gali Ross
